Raphael didn't mean his cartoons to last.

But the people at the V&A do, so they came to Rowney.

In 1515 Raphael didn't paint the cartoons to last. They were intended as full-size colour working designs for a series of tapestries commissioned by Pope Leo X. Raphael painted on paper with distemper, and the paintings lay—cut into strips—at the weavers' workshop. Three were irretrievably lost, and finally Charles I bought the surviving seven. So, it's little wonder that in 1965, some four hundred and fifty years later, the cartoons needed to be restored.

The museum's restorers decided to use Artists' Pastels, and chose Rowney's for their exceptional quality and very large colour range. They liaised with Rowney chemists and research staff, who provided all the materials to retouch the cracks and blemishes in the cartoons.

Now the cleaned and restored cartoons can be seen as Raphael saw them, all the colours fresh and beautiful. With luck they'll last another four hundred and fifty years. Even if Raphael never meant it to happen.

Rowney Artists' Pastels are made from the finest pigments, ground with a mixture of chalk, clay and other ingredients. They're available in an exceedingly large range of colours and tints and are characterised by a velvety smoothness in working.
